

Thomas Massie: War, Israel and Debt Are Destroying America

Thomas Massie is one of the few Republican members of Congress who openly challenges Washington's foreign policy consensus. In this interview, he explains why he believes NATO has outlived its purpose and why America's policy of "forever wars" is driving the country toward both financial ruin and moral decline.

Anyone who reads my work or knows me personally is well aware of my deep-seated skepticism toward the political class as a whole. Whether they wear a red tie or a blue one, whether they claim to be representing the Left or the Right, the underlying hunger for power, the hubris and the hypocrisy remain entirely the same. For a long time, Ron Paul was the lone exception to this rule, and his departure left me convinced that genuine principle and integrity had permanently exited Western politics. That changed when Thomas Massie came along, as his actions spoke louder than his words, and his words were inspiring to begin with. The interview that follows offers a rare, refreshing glimmer of hope that good men can still make a difference, even if the entire corrupt establishment is against them.

Massie delivers a scathing critique of American foreign policy, targeting the asymmetric nature of Washington's alliances and its reliance on constant overseas interventions. He argues that outdated structures like NATO unnecessarily antagonize foreign powers and that the current military actions against Iran serve foreign strategic interests rather than domestic ones. According to Massie, the US-Israel relationship is highly one-sided and deeply captive to domestic lobbying groups, which were responsible for funding a massive multi million dollar campaign to engineer his recent primary defeat. He also very presciently anticipated that it would be very hard for the US to end the Iran conflict without Israel's "permission", which is exactly what we have been seeing in recent weeks: even after the US President signed a deal with Tehran, Israel kept violating the terms by relentlessly attacking Lebanon and insisting they will keep occupying the southern parts of the country.

Ultimately, Massie warns that this aggressive, interventionist posture is driving the country toward systemic downfall through a combination of moral decay and economic collapse. He underscores that the vast, hidden expenses of regional operations, foreign aid, and constant military replenishment are putting the US on a direct path toward fiscal insolvency. At the same time, by providing the heavy military hardware used to flatten entire regions like Gaza and southern Lebanon, the nation is rapidly losing its global moral authority. To safeguard the future, Massie concludes that the political establishment must abandon its unsustainable "forever wars" and return to both constitutional accountability at home and a standard of reciprocal ethics abroad.
